Questions

The following questions arise from a grandparent visitation court order setting up a court ordered psychologist to treat the children involved over the objections of the parents.

1. Is a trial court's order in a third party visitation litigation, which orders a psychologist to intervene in the relationship of a parent and child in order to alter the child's attitude concerning the third party, an unconstitutional infringement on a fit parent's right of custody and control under the 14th Amendment of the US Constitution?

2. Is Arizona's third party visitation law, A.R.S. §25-409, an unconstitutional infringement on a fit parent's right of custody and control?

3. Does the above-mentioned order of a trial court violate due process and equal protection safeguards when only one of two legal parents is party to the litigation?

Statement of Jurisdiction

On December 7, 2000, the Arizona Supreme Court denied without comment to review a published earlier opinion by Division I of the Arizona Court of Appeals in the case of Kathryn Graville et vir. v. Douglas P Dodge, CV-00-0225-PR. The petition for review initially resulted from an opinion that was entered by the Arizona Court of Appeals, Division One, in the case of Graville v. Dodge, No. 1 CA-CV 99-0582 (Ariz.App.Div.1 05/23/2000), which was in response to an appeal from an order by the Superior Court in the same matter, DR 97-90192 (see in the Appendix, Order by the Honorable Judge Cheryl K Hendrix, Superior Court of Maricopa County, Arizona). The United States Supreme Court has jurisdiction in this matter under rule 11(c).

> "(c) a state court or a United States court of appeals has decided an important question of federal law that has not been, but should be, settled by this Court, or[and] has decided an important federal question in a way that conflicts with relevant decisions of this Court." [added by Petitioner to clarify the claim]

It is Petitioner's contention that this action has violated his constitutional right to due process under the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, and should be reversed. It is clear that, at least as far as the instant case, no Arizona court is willing to defend or even recognize the right of a parent to custody and control of his children. Without intervention in this matter by the United States Supreme Court, this right effectively does not exist in Arizona in the instant case and other cases within Arizona.

Notice of Service Pursuant to Rule 29

This document has been served by mail on the attorney of record for the opposing party and personally on the opposing parties themselves. In addition, since the constitutionality of a state statute may be in question, this was also served by mail on the Attorney General of the State of Arizona pursuant to 28 U. S. C. § 2403(b). Proof of service accompanied this document when it was filed with the United States Supreme Court.

Material Facts of the Case

Douglas Paul Dodge (Petitioner) and Gayla Graville were married in March 1988. This union resulted in the birth of two children, Victoria and Amanda (whose name was legally changed from Casey in a subsequent adoption). Douglas Dodge, a Sergeant in the U.S. Army, was subsequently assigned to duties (Sinai peacekeeping force and Desert Storm) which prevented cohabitation for long periods of time. During these periods, the mother (Gayla) often resided with the minor children at the home of her parents, Donald and Lucille Graville, the Respondents herein.

At or around the birth of the second child Amanda (now 10 years old), Gayla contracted what proved ultimately to be a fatal renal disease. After Desert Storm, Gayla moved from the family home near Sergeant Dodge's duty station at the Aberdeen proving ground in Maryland to her parent's home in Mesa, Arizona. She subsequently sought a divorce from Dodge, and shortly remarried. Gayla's second marriage lasted two years and ended in divorce. During this time, the children moved often, which also included a period of residence in the home of the paternal grandparents. Eventually, in 1996, Gayla died suddenly from complications associated with her renal disease.

Several years after the divorce, Sergeant Dodge met and married Andrea McAllister. He separated from the Army and, after a brief stay in California, pursued a career in law enforcement in Arizona. As a result of the untimely death of Gayla, he suddenly became the sole custodial parent of his two children, Victoria and Amanda, and was aided by his wife, who was then the stepmother and who has since legally adopted the girls. Substantial visitation continued with the maternal grandparents until problems began to occur, which was of sufficient seriousness that Dodge felt it necessary to temporarily suspend visitation with the genetic grandparents.

After the 90-day period required by Arizona law (A.R.S. §25-409), Respondents petitioned for Court-ordered visitation. A bench trial occurred in late 1997 and, in 1998, an order was entered ordering visitation.

During this action, Douglas Dodge's ability as a parent was not questioned and his fitness as a parent was stipulated to by Respondents on several occasions (see one instance in the Appendix). Dodge, with his new family, established a home in Surprise, Arizona near where he was employed as a peace officer in Peoria, Arizona. With his wife, Andrea, he initiated a petition for Andrea's adoption of the children, and the adoption was granted in March of 1998. At that time, both girls desired to have their names changed, with Victoria dropping her middle name and Casey changing her name to Amanda. The Respondents refused to call the children by their legal names[1]

Dodge appealed the trial court order on several grounds, including the fact that Arizona's law was an unconstitutional infringement on his 14th Amendment right to due process. In its ruling on that appeal, the Arizona Court of Appeals upheld the constitutionality of Arizona law based on a standard that the statute presented a minimum intrusion into Dodge's right. However, significant portions of the trial court's order were stricken as being unconstitutional as applied because they were too intrusive into Dodge's right of custody and control. One of particular relevance to the instant case was a provision that prohibited Dodge from discussing the court actions with his children nor to say anything disparaging concerning the Respondents. Dodge petitioned the Arizona Supreme Court to review this opinion, which was denied in September of 1999.

While the appeal was pending, the Respondents filed a contempt action. This action resulted in another bench trial and, in September 1999, a court order was issued, referred to here as the Hendrix Order (see the Appendix), which was a mixture of purge orders dealing with a finding of contempt and which included additional, new orders. During this action, there was no independent evaluation of the children by an independent medical or psychological professional, and it is undisputed that there was no court or psychologist examination of the children of any kind (see footnote 6 of the Appeals opinion[2] [referred for clarity subsequently as Dodge v. Graville III]). Because the appeal was pending, the trial court did not have access to even the scant records of any psychologist examinations of the children (the only one being a brief one-half hour examination which occurred two years prior).

Dodge appealed the purge order portion of the Hendrix order under the Special Action provisions of Arizona Rules of Civil Appellate Procedure. The Arizona Court of Appeals, in an unpublished opinion, upheld the finding of contempt by the trial court but struck all the purge sections of the order without remand, effectively leaving a contempt finding without enforcement.

Consequently, and as required by Arizona's rules and case law, Dodge separately appealed those portions of the Hendrix order which were new orders (Dodge v. Graville III) . Particularly pertinent to this appeal was a provision in the order that Dodge would be required to take his children to a court-ordered psychologist, Dr. Block, for "therapeutic intervention". This provision seemingly resulted from the testimony of the Respondents that the children expressed to them the desire never to see them again during one of the court ordered visits. The real intention of the court order was disputed by the Arizona Court of Appeals since the term "intervention" is generic and not a psychological term without a precise professional definition. Dodge contends that the clear intent is to intervene in his relationship with his children in order to alter their naturally formed beliefs and attitudes about the Respondents rather than provide any beneficial professional treatment for the children.

In the cited opinion, the Arizona Court of Appeals found no constitutional issues in this matter (and indeed saw no legal distinction between parents and grandparents [see footnote 5 of the Court of Appeals opinion, Dodge v. Graville III]) and thus chose to decide the case solely on statutory construction grounds. The stated authority by the Court of Appeals for this "therapeutic intervention" was A.R.S. §25-410(B), a divorce statute that does not mention grandparents. The Arizona Court of Appeals, in its opinion, chose to suggest that the legislature must have meant grandparents when it said parents in this statute and, therefore, the court had authority for its actions.

However, Dodge believes that long established precedent upholds his 14th Amendment right as a fit parent to custody and control of his children and, most particularly, in the absence of any independent professional-supporting diagnosis, he should not be forced to submit his children to what he feels is a risky "therapeutic intervention" treatment just to assure that his children's attitudes please the court. In addition, Dodge contends that since his wife, the legal mother of the children, vigorously objects to the psychological treatment, and has never even appeared in court, she should not be forced to allow this "therapeutic intervention" without any form of due process. Neither the Arizona Court of Appeals or the Arizona Supreme Court chose to give any consideration to either of the Dodges' constitutional rights in this matter.

In the interest of fully disclosing all the facts of this case to this Court, although subsequent events may not be relevant, significant events have occurred since the original action leading to the instant petition: Dr. Block, after a brief interview with Dodge, has withdrawn from the case for unstated reasons. Dodge has moved to another State (Washington) where he is employed as a peace officer. The Respondents have filed another contempt petition seeking to replace Dr. Block with another psychologist, and Dodge has disputed the jurisdiction of an Arizona court in the absence of any attempt on the part of the Respondents to domesticate Arizona's orders in situ.

Argument for Question 1:

Is a trial court's order in a third party visitation litigation, which orders a psychologist to intervene in the relationship of a parent and child in order to alter the child's attitude concerning the third party, an unconstitutional infringement on a fit parent's right of custody and control under the 14th Amendment of the US Constitution?

"It cannot now be doubted that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects the fundamental right of parents to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children[3]." This case is a long saga of attempts to obtain due process from the Arizona judicial system, attempts that Dodge feels have been consistently thwarted and frustrated. However, while Dodge feels that the previous two appeals, two bench trials, and numerous orders have violated his rights under the 14th Amendment, the mere review of these thousands of documents would be daunting to any court or institution and is now untimely.

However, this petition for review is focused on a very narrow subset of the total history of the instant case. As explained above, the Honorable Cheryl K Hendrix, a Superior Court Judge in Maricopa County Arizona in September of 1999 entered a signed order that was a mixture of findings of fact, precatory statements, new orders, and purge orders[4]. Under Arizona case law and the Rules of Civil Appellate Procedure, the purge orders must be appealed under a provision of the Rules of Civil Procedure which offers expedited reviews in the form of Special Actions. New orders, even when co-mingled with other matters, must be appealed separately in an independent appeal. The appeal of the new orders was timely lodged and, in May of 2000, an opinion was released by Division One of the Arizona Court of Appeals as explained previously (this opinion, fully contained in the Appendix, will be referred as Graville v. Dodge III). A timely Petition for Review by the Arizona Supreme Court was entered with the Arizona Court of Appeals, as required by Arizona Rules of Civil Appellate Procedure, and, on December 7, 2000, the Petition for Review was denied[5]. Under Arizona case law, this denial of review confirms the findings of the Division One, Court of Appeals' Opinion, and effectively extends as precedent case law in the state of Arizona.

As to Question #1, this Petition For Writ Of Certiorari is for those aspects of the order that represents new orders, which was denied Certiorari by the Arizona Supreme Court and, in particular, by the following excerpt from the Hendrix order:

> "Pursuant to ARS §25-410(B) Dr. Robert A. Block, PhD is appointed to exercise continuing supervision over this case to assure that visitation orders are complied with and to provide therapeutic intervention so that a relationship between the children and the grandparents can be a possibility if not a reality....Dr. Block shall have sole discretion in determining the number of sessions necessary prior to having unsupervised time with the children. To purge himself of the contempt the respondent must pay the required fees and expenses and must cause the children to be available at and to the sessions. " [emphasis added to original hand written Hendrix Order]

Dodge contends that this order is an unconstitutional infringement on his right of custody and control in that his judgment and, by inference, his wife's judgment, as fit parents is not even considered when a court orders treatment, not for the welfare or benefit of the children but, as explained above, to alter an attitude in the children concerning the genetic grandparents that the court did not feel the children should be allowed to hold.

The issue is not how the children obtained this attitude, indeed there is no finding of fact from the court and no evidence on that issue. If there had been evidence that Dodge was somehow responsible for the children's attitude, it is simply not relevant based on no known statute or principle in law that would allow the interference of communication between parent and child. In the previous state court ruling in Graville v. Dodge I, 195 Ariz. 119, 985 P.2d 604 (Ariz.App.Div.1 01/28/1999 cert. denied), the Court of Appeals stated that, "the orders impinge directly on Dodge's parental communication with his children. This intrudes directly upon Dodge's ability to exercise parental control and amounts to an unconstitutional exercise of the court's authority granted by the statute." Thus, how and why the children developed their dislike for their genetic grandparents cannot be at issue. What is at issue, however, is whether the trial court may order "therapeutic intervention" or, for that matter, any treatment without first determining that the parents are somehow unfit (in the instant case, it was stipulated to by the Respondents on several occasions that Dodge is a fit parent [see the Appendix]).

While Troxel v. Granville may have added clarity of an opinion from the Supreme Court of the United States, it was admittedly not available when the Arizona Court of Appeals opinion was authored. However, Troxel was available when the Supreme Court of Arizona denied Certiorari. Because it was eminent, it was briefed extensively to the Arizona Court of Appeals (see footnote 2 of the Appeal Court opinion in Dodge v. Graville III), who chose not to wait fourteen more days for the issuance of the United States Supreme Court opinion in this case.

However, this case could easily be decided in case law without any knowledge of the recent Troxel opinion. Since 1979, a United States Supreme Court opinion concerning the rights of parents when psychological or other professional treatment is being ordered by the state has been available in Parham v. J. R., 442 U.S. 584, 602. In that opinion, this court found that, "parents -- who have traditional interests in and responsibility for the upbringing of their child -- retain a substantial, if not the dominant, role in the decision, absent a finding of neglect or abuse." This Court went on to find that, "they [parents] retain plenary authority to seek such care for their children, subject to an independent medical judgment." [explanation and emphasis added] There was no medical judgment in the instant case nor any independent examination of the children of any kind (even by a professionally unqualified person) in this case. The children were merely ordered by the court to be taken to a psychologist who was not known by the parties, over the objection of both legal parents, one involved in the litigation and the other one never having been made party to the litigation. The judge, who does not qualify as a competent psychologist, refused to interview the children, and the only psychological examination of the children occurred two years prior in the Keppel trial which was not orientated towards this issue since it did not exist at that time.

We now turn to the Arizona Court of Appeals' opinion, Dodge v. Graville III, concerning constitutionality of the order. In ¶ 42 of the attached opinion, the Court of Appeals states, "C. The Hendrix Order is not an Unconstitutional Application of the Grandparents' Visitation Statute." The Court of Appeals, notwithstanding the Parham v. J.R. opinion extensively briefed, choose to ignore any constitutional issues other than the amount of ordered visitation time. The Arizona Court of Appeals states in ¶ 44, "The Hendrix Order does not enlarge or significantly alter the visitation provisions we have already approved in the prior appeal", as justification for its statement in ¶ 42, referenced above.

Dodge feels this finding is in error since the Court of Appeals clearly anticipated that any decisions concerning treatment under the order were to be entirely between the court and psychologist, without parental input, when it states in ¶ 26, "However, if the order places Dr. Block in a position where he may be forced to disregard any ethical or professional obligations, Dr. Block may raise these issues with the trial court. Thereafter, the trial court can terminate Dr. Block's appointment, and modify the visitation order, as appropriate."

Dodge feels that case law is clear, that in the absence of any independent evaluation to the contrary, the plenary authority to decide on psychological treatment rests with the parent. Dodge has been found fit during the adoption process, his wife has been investigated by the state and found suitable to adopt the children, and there is no finding of fact anywhere in the record to the contrary. As such, he should not be forced to accept treatment he feels is dangerous and harmful from a psychologist that was, at the time, a complete stranger to Dodge and his family.

The U.S. Supreme Court should accept this case to prevent such intrusions into the family becoming accepted case law in Arizona, and conceivably nationwide. Without Supreme Court intervention in cases such as this, a fit parent's right of custody and control of their children becomes a hollow right. Especially when state courts are unable or unwilling to distinguish between parents and other third parties, such as the Arizona Court of Appeals did in the instant case when it stated, "The best interests of the child are not well-served by an interpretation of § 25-410 that conditions assistance for visitation upon the identity of the party making the request for help.[6] "

Clearly the Court of Appeals in the instant case is unable or unwilling to distinguish between legal parents, protected by the 14th Amendment, and other third parties with no such protection in statute, common, or constitutional law. By this opinion, court ordered therapeutic intervention could, at the discretion of the court, be applied at the behest of any individual, independent of their relationship with the children or language of the statute based only on what the court opines is in the best interests of the children, with no consideration of the parent's opinion whatsover. Without correction, the distinction between parents and grandparents, teachers, social workers, etc., declared often by the United States Supreme Court, becomes a hollow distinction in any real practical terms.

Arguments Question 2:

Is Arizona's third party visitation law, A.R.S. §25-409, an unconstitutional infringement on a fit parent's right of custody and control?

Arizona's third party visitation statute structure consists of two statutes, A.R.S. § 25-409

[6] See footnote 5 in Dodge v. Graville III

and A.R.S. §25-415, the first covering genetic grandparents and the second extending visitation to all other individuals who might claim a close relationship with the children in question. The instant case has been conducted entirely under the authority of A.R.S. §25-409 since the Respondents are the genetic grandparents (if not legal grandparents having this status terminated by adoption). If the statute were facially unconstitutional or unconstitutional as applied, then no enforcement action or new order contemplated under the Hendrix order would be lawful. Troxel v. Granville recently dealt with, in detail, the issue of grandparent visitation. The case law foundation for tests of constitutionality of Arizona's grandparent visitation law rests with Graville v. Dodge I, where Division I of the Arizona Court of Appeals found,

> "Thus, when a law does not substantially infringe upon a person's fundamental rights we examine the challenged statute under the rational basis standard of review. That is, we will uphold the law if it is reasonably related to a legitimate state objective..... Examining A.R.S. section 25-409 with this principle in mind, we conclude that its provision for grandparent visitation does not substantially infringe on parents' fundamental rights."

This finding was referred to (see footnote 2)

as the basis for finding that there were no constitutional issues in the instant case and thus, by reference, extends that opinion to the reasoning in the instant case. This finding appears to be in conflict with Troxel v. Granville where the United States Supreme Court stated:

> "The decisional framework employed by the Superior Court directly contravened the traditional presumption that a fit parent will act in the best interest of his or her child. See Parham, supra, at 602. In that respect, the court's presumption failed to provide any protection for Granville's fundamental constitutional right to make decisions concerning the rearing of her own daughters."

It may be that this difference may be credited to the selection of an incorrect standard of review by the Arizona Court, ignoring Justice Thomas's observation in concurring in Troxel, "I would apply strict scrunity to infringements of fundamental rights."

It is hard to distinguish the instant case on the record from that of Tommie Granville (Wynn), leaving Dodge with a sharply different outcome for indistinguishable facts. Visitation was never completely denied, just suspended when problems arose. The court gave no weight to Dodge's opinion of what was in the best interest of his children. The final decision was merely reduced to the Judge's opinion versus the parents, with the judge prevailing.

Further, similar to the statute in Washington state, Arizona's statute is "breathtakingly broad", albeit spread over two statutes, and provides no provision for any weight to be applied to the parent's opinion, suggesting that the only factor to be considered is the "motive of person denying visitation[7] " concerning the best interests of their children.

There is no requirement of any kind for the court to find that harm would result if the parent's opinion prevailed. Thus the parent is forced to argue why visitation should not be granted contrasted to the grandparents and other third parties merely proving their status as grandparents, ex-boy and girl friends, etc., to justify their claim for visitation. In contrast, divorce cases under A.R.S. §25-411 require the complaining parent to attend a pre-hearing to justify a reasonable change to their visitation status before best interests may be considered, yet grandparents and other third parties under A.R.S. §25-409 and 25- 415 are required to prove nothing except their status.

As we have explained above, the order in

[7] see this and a companion and virtually identical provision applying to grandparents in ARS §25-409 illustrating the chasm between the Troxel wording requiring "special weight to the parent's opinion" and this statute requiring identical evaluations of motives of both parties.

the instant case completely ignores any parental input to psychological treatment of the children. Thus, Dodge feels that the Arizona Statute is unconstitutional on its face and is certainly unconstitutional as applied to his case. Thus, the entire action that led to the Hendrix order is unlawful and the Hendrix order should be overturned for that reason alone.

Arguments for Question 3:

Does the above-mentioned order of a trial court violate due process and equal protection safeguards when only one of two legal parents is party to the litigation?

Dodge argued that the legal mother (by adoption) to these children has never been made a party to this litigation. Certainly all the orders in this case, but most specifically the Hendrix order, interferes with her right of custody and control. The Arizona Court of Appeal in ¶ 26 of its opinion in Graville v. Dodge III, stated,

> "Dodge further asserts that Dr. Block's court-ordered duties present an ethical dilemma for him because they ..... (ii) force him to encourage the children's visits with the Gravilles in violation of a psychologist's obligation to respect a parent's judgment regarding the treatment of a child.... However, if the order places Dr. Block in a position where he may be > forced to disregard any ethical or professional obligations, Dr. Block may raise these issues with the trial court."

There is clearly no room in this pronouncement for the Mother's opinion as to what is in the best interest of her children.

While some might contend that this issue is not properly before the court, Dodge disagrees First the fact that the mother is not a party is solely due to the court's refusal, on two occasions, to join the legal mother in the litigation or to provide alternate due process to her as a matter of equity. This is not, however, a petition to protect the rights of the Mother but rather to protect the Father's right to have the court recognize the impact of him now having a partner in parenting. In Arizona law, this is a significant matter since A.R.S. §25-409 does not recognize the right to petition the court when a family is intact. Despite a clause in the statute [ARS §25-409(D)] that some interpret as somehow making stepparent adoptions to be second class, there is no credible argument for treating such adoptive parents unequal under the law. After the adoption took place, these children had two legal parents. The equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment requires that the Father no longer stands alone and the court should not place the Father and Mother at odds: one under a court order to harm his children by visitation with individuals he feels will undermine the children's mental well being; the other free from court ordered behavior, commanded by law to do what she feels is in the best interests of the children.

Equitable treatment as well as good judgment demands that this change of status be recognized by the court, since it leaves the court making orders based on a fictional case with similar facts to the instant case, missing the reality of the family unit.

The United States Supreme Court states in Quillion v. Walcott 1978.SCT.217, 434 U.S. 246, 98 S. Ct. 549, 54 L. Ed. 2d 511 in quoting Smith v. Organization of Foster Families, 431 U.S. 816, 862-863 :

> "We have little doubt that the Due Process Clause would be offended " [if] a State were to attempt to force the breakup of a natural family, over the objections of the parents and their children, without some showing of unfitness and for the sole reason that to do so was thought to be in the children's best interest."

The United States Supreme court continues in that case by stating that, "the result of the adoption in this case is to give full recognition to a family unit already in existence, a result desired by all concerned." The Quillion case was that of an adoptive stepparent, as is the instant case, and the state has demonstrated no rational reason that stepparents do not deserve equal protection to that afforded other adoptive parents.

The United States Supreme Court has long recognized that equal protection applies to adoptions. In Lehr v. Robertson, 1983 SCT. 2578,463 U.S. 248, 103 S. Ct. 2985, 77 L. Ed. 2d 614, 51 U.S.L.W. 5010, Justice Stevens in delivering the opinion of the court stated:

> "We have held that these statutes may not constitutionally be applied in that class of cases where the mother and father are in fact similarly situated with regard to their relationship with the child. In Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380 (1979), the Court held that it violated the Equal Protection Clause to grant the mother a veto over the adoption of a 4-year-old girl and a 6-year-old boy, but not to grant a veto to their father, who had admitted paternity and had participated in the rearing of the children."

Applying pressure on one parent, to get the other parent to acquiesce to a course of action the other parent feels is likely to harm the children raises the kind of undue pressures that the court stated would "offend" due process. Ultimately, if harm to the children resulted, as both parents feel it would, it could result in prosecution of the other parent, not protected under the immunity for the consequences of its action afforded by the state court under Stump v. Sparkman 1978.SCT., 435 U.S. 349, 98 S. Ct. 1099, 55 L. Ed. 2d 331.

The United States Supreme Court in Troxel stated, "The liberty interest at issue in this case--the interest of parents in the care, custody, and control of their children--is perhaps the oldest of the fundamental liberty interests recognized by this Court." The family is not made up of independent, unrelated individuals. Harm to one is harm, to a greater or lesser degree, to all. Thus, in the instant case, the order should be reversed and courts nationwide should be prohibited from using secondary harm to non-participating parents to avoid having to provide due process.

Conclusion of Arguments

The instant case results from the court imposing "therapeutic intervention" from a court ordered psychologist. This professional procedure was done over the objections of both fit parents, one subject to court orders, the other not part of the proceedings. It was done with no professional or non-professional advice concerning the procedure of any kind. It was not done to in any way to treat the children but merely to change their attitude towards their former grandparents. It was done despite court knowledge that the United States Supreme Court had already instructed that the "plenary" right to make such decisions rested with the parents in the instant circumstances, both parents not one manipulated by court order to coerce the other to go along. As well the court stated, in its opinion, that the parents and third parties were on equal footing when it came to such issues of deciding on treatment and only the court could decide on treatment procedures and the provider of treatment, excluding the parents totally from the decision making process. The judicial system in the State of Arizona, all the way to the Arizona Supreme Court , has ruled that such invasions of parental rights of custody and control of their children are proper. There is no other location for judicial protection from this action other than the United States Supreme Court. Without the Supreme Court taking this case this precedent becomes law in Arizona an likely will be quoted as precedent in other states in other courts wishing to do similar things.

RESPECTFULLY SUBMITTED this 12th day of February, 2001.

Hendrix Order

In re the Matter of:
KATHRYN LUCILLE and
DONALD GRAVILLE,
Petitioners,
and
DOUGLAS PAUL DODGE
Respondent.

No. DR 97-90192
ORDER RE: CONTEMPT OF
VISITATION ORDER
(Assigned to the Hon.
Cheryl K. Hendrix)

The matter of Petitioners' Accelerated Petition re: Contempt of Visitation Order came on for hearing before this Court. The Respondent filed a Response. The parties appeared in person and by their counsel. Being fully advised in the premises.

THE COURT MAKES THE FOLLOWING FINDINGS:

1. The Petitioners'
(Grandparents) attempts to have and maintain a relationship with their grandchildren have been successfully thwarted by the Respondent He has been, at best, uncooperative in arranging for visitation. His attitude indicates he has been unreasonably vindictive and spiteful in effectively denying visitation.

2. Respondent's attempt to videotape the aborted visitation at the pizza parlor on April 7, 1998 was not £or the purposes of having a record of a joyful reunion between the children and their maternal grandparents

3. Respondent's position that the grandparents should have known his address and telephone number because the information was contained in exhibits that that were either offered or admitted in evidence at a court hearing is disingenuous. It unlikely that litigants themselves know what is contained in exhibits . There is no indication Respondent or his attorney made any effort to make sure the information was given to the Gravilles personally.

4. Respondent's conditions and restrictions placed on contact visitation wre not reasonable, i.e. (a) no gifts, (b) no other relatives being present; and (c) setting visitation times for Tuesday knowing the grandmother had to work late that day of the week.

5. If the grandparents are confrontational in their communication style with respondent during telephone calls it is probably due to their frustration in trying to re-establish their relationship with their grandchildren.

6. Respondent has acknowledged he has not encouraged his daughters to call their maternal grandparents,

7. Respondent decided that the grandparents would not see the girls any more and has furthered his decision by claiming that the girls did not want to see their grandparents. There is no indication the grandparents have done anything of a significant nature to cause alienation. There is every indication Respondent has caused the girls to be alienated from their maternal grandparents.

a. Respondent's conduct and attitude towards the Petitioners is based on his own personal agenda without regard to' the best interests of the children.

9. Respondent's conclusion that visiting with other relatives, along with the grandparents is "harmful" and "too stressful" on the children is baseless.

10. Respondent has not justified his conduct by stating the visitation order was invalid.

11. To the extent ~he order entered in January of 1998 is a valid, viable, and enforceable order, Respondent has willfully and contemptuously violated the order. Respondent is in contempt of court.

IT IS ORDERED THAT:

1. Pursuant to A.R.S. §25-410(B) Dr. Robert

A. Block, PhD. Is appointed to exercise continuing supervision over this case to assure that the visitation orders are complied with ant to provide therapeutic intervention so that a relationship between the children and grandparents can become a possibility, if not a reality. By this appointment the terms of the Maricopa County Superior Court Guidelines regarding Family Court Advisors are incorporated. Dr. Block is appointed for a term of 24 months subject to reappointment or earlier termination on the Court's own motion, request of Dr. Block or motion of either party. Respondent will pay 75% of costs, fees, and expenses charged by Dr. Block. Petitioners shall pay 25%.

2. To purge himself of contempt Respondent shall contact Dr. Block's office within 30 days after this order signed to schedule the first appointment[1] for the children to re-establish their relationship to the Petitioners. Dr. Block shall have sole discretion in determining the number of sessions necessary prior to the Petitioner having unsupervised time with the children. To purge himself of contempt the respondent must pay the required fees and expenses in a timely fashion, and cause the children to be available at and to attend the sessions. To purge himself of the contempt the Respondent shall make the children available for visitation with the Petitioners twice each month, two days during winter recess from school, and on a three day weekend during the summer as ordered by Judge Keppel.

[1]Respondent must notify Petitioners of the date and time of the first appointment within 24 hours after the appointment is made. Subsequent appointments shall be scheduled by Dr. Block & he shall communicate the dates and times to Respondent, Petitioners, and the [hand written footnote not completed]

6. [points 3, 4, or 5 skipped in original order]Petitioners are awarded a judgment against Respondent fees in the amount of $2,610.00 plus costs of $61.00 with interest at 10% per annum from April 1, 1999 until paid in full.

7. Pending further orders of the appellate courts on issuance of a mandate, the order signed on January 6. 1998 (re-issued on January 28, 19998) is confirmed.

[9] DEPARTMENT E
[10] OPINION
[11] AFFIRMED
[12] ¶1 Respondent-appellant Douglas

Paul Dodge ("Dodge") appeals from the trial court's Contempt of Visitation Order, which found that he had violated an order providing for visitation between petitioners-appellees Kathryn Lucille and Donald Graville (the "Gravilles") and their two granddaughters, Dodge's minor children. For the reasons discussed below, we affirm the trial court's order.

[13] FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND fn1

[14] ¶2 This appeal arises out of the Gravilles' attempt to obtain visitation with their two granddaughters under Arizona's Grandparents' Visitation Rights statute, Arizona Revised Statutes Annotated ("A.R.S.") section 25-409 (Supp. 1999).

[15] ¶3 In January 1998, the Honorable James H. Keppel entered an order (the "Keppel Order") awarding the Gravilles visitation rights with their granddaughters. This order required Dodge to allow the Gravilles visits with the children at least twice a month for four to eight hours at a time, and instructed both Dodge and the Gravilles to notify each other at least three days in advance of any change in address or telephone number. Dodge appealed the order, and this court affirmed the visitation and notification terms, but struck other provisions of the order. Graville v. Dodge, 195 Ariz. 119, 128, ¶¶ 39-42, 985 P.2d 604, 613 (App. 1999), review denied, Graville v. Dodge, No. CV-99- 00910PR (June 16, 1999)("Dodge I").

[16] ¶4 While the appeal in Dodge I was pending, the Gravilles petitioned the trial court for an order finding Dodge in contempt of the Keppel Order. After a hearing, the Honorable Cheryl K. Hendrix found Dodge in contempt and entered an order to that effect (the "Hendrix Order").

[17] ¶5 Dodge challenged the Hendrix Order via both a special action and this direct appeal. In the special action, we accepted jurisdiction in part, and declined to grant the relief sought by Dodge therein. This appeal involves the provisions of the Hendrix Order appointing Robert A. Block, Ph.D., to supervise compliance with the visitation orders and provide therapeutic intervention. We have jurisdiction to consider this appeal pursuant to A.R.S. section 12-2101(C) (1994).

[18] Standard of Review

[19] ¶6 The trial court has broad discretion in issuing visitation orders, and we will not disturb such an order absent an abuse of that discretion fn2 Armer v. Armer, 105 Ariz. 284, 289, 463 P.2d 818, 823 (1970). Further, we will not set aside findings of fact unless clearly erroneous, and we give due regard to the opportunity of the trial court to judge the credibility of witnesses. See Ariz. R. Civ. P. 52(a); In re Marriage of Berger, 140 Ariz. 156, 161, 680 P.2d 1217, 1222 (App. 1983).

[20] Discussion

[21] ¶7 Dodge challenges the Hendrix Order on numerous grounds. We address each in turn.

[22] A. The Hendrix Order is not Vague and Ambiguous, and does not Place Dr. Block in an Ethical Dilemma.

[23] ¶8 Dodge asserts that Dr. Block's duties under the order are vague and ambiguous and, therefore, the order is unenforceable. The Hendrix Order provides, in pertinent part:

[24] Pursuant to A.R.S. § 25-410(B), Dr. Robert A. Block, Ph.D. is appointed to exercise continuing supervision over this case to assure that the visitation orders are complied with and to provide therapeutic [intervention] so that a relationship between the children and grandparents can become a possibility if not a reality. By this appointment the terms of the Maricopa County Superior Court Guidelines regarding Family Court Advisors are incorporated.

[25] We do not find this order indecipherable. The terms of visitation are clearly set forth in the Keppel Order and should be easily understood by Dr. Block so as to allow him to supervise compliance with the order. Moreover, it is evident from the court's findings that "therapeutic intervention" refers to employment of Dr. Block's skills to re-establish, if possible, the relationship between the Gravilles and their grandchildren fn3 Finally, although the Maricopa County Superior Court Guidelines regarding Family Court Advisors were not included in the record on appeal, we presume from their label that they provide additional guidance to Dr. Block.

[26] ¶9 Dodge further asserts that Dr.

Block's court-ordered duties present an ethical dilemma for him because they (i) require him to enforce the court's visitation order, even though it might vary from his professional judgment regarding the case; and (ii) force him to encourage the children's visits with the Gravilles over Dodge's objections and in violation of a psychologist's obligation to respect a parent's judgment regarding the treatment of a child. We do not interpret the Hendrix Order as requiring Dr. Block to "enforce" the visitation order, or to violate his ethical obligations. However, if the order places Dr. Block in a position where he may be forced to disregard any ethical or professional obligations, Dr. Block may raise these issues with the trial court. Thereafter, the trial court can terminate Dr. Block's appointment, fn4 and modify the visitation order, as appropriate. The possibility that Dr. Block may experience an ethical dilemma at a future date does not serve to invalidate the Hendrix Order.

[29] ¶10 The trial court relied on A.R.S. section 25-410(B) (Supp. 1999) to appoint Dr. Block to supervise the parties' visitation. This provision states, in pertinent part:

[30] B. If either parent requests the order, or if all contestants agree to the order, or if the court finds that in the absence of the order the child's physical health would be endangered or his emotional development significantly impaired, and if the court finds that the best interests of the child would be served, the court shall order a local social service agency to exercise continuing supervision over the case to assure that the custodial or visitation terms of the decree are carried out. A.R.S. § 25-410(B).

[31] ¶11 Dodge asserts that section 25-410(B) does not apply to this case because it addresses disputes between parents, not cases involving grandparents' visitation. Dodge argues that by invoking this statute to appoint Dr. Block, the trial court impermissibly gave statutory protections to the Gravilles that the legislature intended only to extend to parents. We disagree.

[32] ¶12 Section 25-410(B) does not state that supervised visitation may only be ordered in cases in which parents are opposing parties. Although this provision states that "either parent" may request such an order, it also provides that supervised visitation may be ordered if "all contestants" agree to the order, or if the trial court deems it necessary under specified conditions. Dodge argues that the lack of reference to grandparents in A.R.S. section 25-410(B) evidences the legislature's intent that supervised visitation cannot be ordered in cases in which grandparents are granted visitation under A.R.S. section 25-409. The Gravilles counter that the term "contestants," as used in section 25-410(B), includes grandparents, and supervised visitation can be ordered anytime a child's physical or emotional health is endangered or impaired.

[33] ¶13 To determine legislative intent, we first review a statute's language. See Calmat of Arizona v. State ex rel. Miller, 176 Ariz. 190, 193, 859 P.2d 1323, 1326 (1993). Because A.R.S. section 25-410(B) does not expressly address grandparent visitation, we must look beyond the statutory language and consider the statute's effects and consequences, as well as its spirit and purpose. See id. We must also interpret section 25- 410(B) in light of A.R.S. section 25-409 (Supp. 1999). See Goulder v. Arizona Dep't of Transp., Motor Vehicle Div., 177 Ariz. 414, 416, 868 P.2d 997, 999 (App. 1993)("Statutes relating to the same subject matter should be read in pari materia to determine legislative intent and to maintain harmony."). The goal is to achieve consistency between the statutes. See id. at 416, 868 P.2d at 999.

[34] ¶14 The legislature has expressed its intention that grandparents be granted visitation rights under specified circumstances. See A.R.S. § 25-409. The clear intent of granting such rights was to serve the best interests of the child. See id. ("The superior court may grant the grandparents of the child reasonable visitation rights to the child during his minority on a finding that the visitation rights would be in the best interests of the child.")(emphasis added). In light of the grant of visitation rights to grandparents, it would be absurd to believe that the legislature intended to leave the trial court without the ability to implement the visitation order, if necessary, through supervised visitation. See State v. Medrano-Barraza, 190 Ariz. 472, 474, 949 P.2d 561, 563 (App. 1997)("We presume the framers of the statute did not intend an absurd result and our construction must avoid such a consequence."); see also A.R.S. § 1-211(B) ("Statutes shall be liberally construed to effect their objects and to promote justice."). Phrased another way, having recognized that the best interests of a child may compel granting visitation rights to grandparents, the legislature surely did not intend to disregard those interests by failing to allow supervised visitation when the physical or emotional health of the child is at risk. See Forino v. Arizona Dep't of Transp., 191 Ariz. 77, 80, 952 P.2d 315, 318 (App. 1997)("To discern the legislature's intent, we may consider the effect and consequences of alternative construction."); see also Phoenix v. Superior Court, 139 Ariz. 175, 178, 677 P.2d 1283, 1286 (1984) (cardinal rule of statutory interpretation is to ascertain legislative intent, and court should interpret statute so as to give it a fair and sensible meaning). Additionally, and after our review of the legislative history of A.R.S. sections 25-409 and 25-410(B), we discern no reason why the legislature would allow the trial courts discretion to order supervision for parent visitation, but deny such relief for grandparent visitation. fn5 For these reasons, we hold that the legislature intended to allow the trial court to order supervised visitation under section 25- 410(B) in grandparent visitation cases.

[35] ¶15 Dodge next claims that even if section 25-410(B) applies to grandparent visitation, Judge Hendrix failed to comply with the statute because appointment of a therapist was not (i) sought by either parent; (ii) agreed upon by all the contestants; or (iii) found by the trial court as necessary for the children's physical or emotional health. See A.R.S. § 25-410(B). We reject Dodge's argument because the trial court ruled that Dr. Block's assistance was needed to ensure compliance with the visitation orders, given Dodge's history of obstructionism and contempt for the court's orders. This ruling constitutes a finding that the order was necessary for the children's emotional health. Therefore, the trial court made the threshold finding mandated by section 25-410(B).

[36] ¶16 Dodge additionally contends that Judge Hendrix could not order supervised visitation because her involvement in the case was limited to the contempt proceedings. During these proceedings, however, Judge Hendrix examined the Keppel Order, reviewed expert evidence indicating that visitation with the Gravilles is in the children's best interests, heard testimony and considered other evidence revealing Dodge's continual defiance of the Keppel Order. fn6 We find that Judge Hendrix had before her the information needed for her determination that Dr. Block's assistance in enforcing the visitation order was in the children's best interests. fn7

[37] 2. Authority under A.R.S. section

25-414(A).

[38] ¶17 Even if A.R.S. section 25-410(B) did not apply to support the Hendrix Order, the trial court had authority to appoint a counselor to supervise the parties' visitation pursuant to A.R.S. section 25-414(A) (Supp. 1999), the statute governing violation of visitation rights. Subsection (A)(4) of that statute specifically authorizes the court to order family counseling, while subsection (A)(7) allows the court to "[m]ake any other order that may promote the best interests of the child or children involved." A.R.S. § 25-414(A). Dodge asserts that we cannot rely on A.R.S. section 25-414(A) because Judge Hendrix cited A.R.S. section 25-410(B) as the basis for her appointment of Dr. Block. However, we can affirm the trial court's ruling if it was correct for any reason. See Hale v. Amphitheater School Dist. No. 10, 192 Ariz. 111, 114, ¶ 5, 961 P.2d 1059, 1062 (App. 1998).

[39] ¶18 Dodge next claims that A.R.S. section 25-414 applies only to disputes between parents and is inapplicable to grandparent visitation. We reject this argument for the same reasons we reject Dodge's argument regarding the scope of A.R.S. section 25-410(B).

[40] ¶19 Dodge further contends that Dr. Block's appointment is not equivalent to the "family counseling" allowed under A.R.S. section 25-414(A)(4). Dodge's main complaint appears to be that Dr. Block's appointment to supervise the parties "indefinitely" goes "far beyond" the appointment of a family counselor. The court did not appoint Dr. Block for an indefinite (or infinite) time period. Rather, the order sets a presumptive two-year term for Dr. Block's appointment, which may be reduced or extended per further court order.

[41] ¶20 Dodge also complains that the "catch-all" provision in A.R.S. section 25-414(A)(7) should not apply to grandparents' visitation cases because it would authorize a vast array of orders, some of which will "undoubtedly" substantially interfere with parents' rights to decide issues regarding their children's welfare and upbringing. As discussed infra, Dodge has not demonstrated that the Hendrix Order substantially interferes with his parenting rights. To the extent that orders in other cases might do so, courts will have to address those issues on a case-by-case basis.

[42] C. The Hendrix Order is not an Unconstitutional Application of the Grandparents' Visitation Statute.

[43] ¶21 Dodge argues that appointment of Dr. Block to supervise and provide "therapeutic intervention" in the visits between the Gravilles and their grandchildren infringes upon his constitutional rights to custody and control of his children, as well as his children's constitutional rights to be free of "thought reform." As a result, he argues that the Hendrix Order represents an unconstitutional application of the Grandparents' Visitation Rights statute.

[44] ¶22 In Dodge I, this court concluded that the visitation provisions of the Keppel Order did not constitute a substantial or unconstitutional interference with Dodge's parental rights. 195 Ariz. at 128, ¶ 39, 985 P.2d at 613. The Hendrix Order does not enlarge or significantly alter the visitation provisions we have already approved in the prior appeal. Rather, it merely provides a means by which the visitation may be more effectively carried out given the parties' history of discord. This order does not impermissibly infringe upon Dodge's parental rights. ¶23 Moreover, the order does not subject the children to any type of "thought control." It simply appoints a therapist to supervise and facilitate the visits to ensure the least amount of disturbance to the children.

[45] D. The Hendrix Order does not Impermissibly Expand on the Keppel Order, nor does it Delegate the Court's Discretion to Dr. Block.

[46] ¶24 Dodge contends that the Hendrix Order impermissibly expands on the Keppel Order by providing for unsupervised visitation after Dr. Block determines that supervised visitation is no longer necessary. Contrary to Dodge's assertion, however, the Hendrix Order did not contradict the Keppel Order. The latter order never barred unsupervised visitation. Rather, the only limitation regarding the mechanics of the visitation concerned the location of the visits. The Keppel Order provided that the first two months of visits should occur in a public place "to accommodate [Dodge's] concerns of sanitary conditions and secondary smoke; and to accommodate the children's possible discomfort of being in the same home where their Mother died." After this two-month adjustment period, the visits could be held at any location. Moreover, other provisions of the Keppel Order, such as the provision allowing the Gravilles a three-day weekend with the children during their summer vacation, indicate that unsupervised visitation was contemplated by Judge Keppel.

[47] ¶25 Relying upon DePasquale v. Superior Court, 181 Ariz. 333, 890 P.2d 628 (App. 1995), Dodge next argues that the Hendrix Order inappropriately vests authority in an expert to make decisions that should be reserved to the trial court. DePasquale is distinguishable from the case at issue, and we therefore reject Dodge's argument.

[48] ¶26 In DePasquale, this court held that the trial court erred by declaring that it would order whatever interim child custody a psychologist might recommend. 181 Ariz. at 335-336, 890 P.2d at 630-631. The DePasquale court concluded that while a court may consider expert opinion in making custody decisions, it "can neither delegate a judicial decision to an expert witness nor abdicate its responsibility to exercise independent judgment." Id. at 336, 890 P.2d at 631. Here, the trial court did not relinquish to Dr. Block its authority to determine visitation issues or the best interests of the children, thereby complying with DePasquale. In the first part of this case, Judge Keppel examined the evidence, including the family assessment evaluation of Dr. Marlene Joy, and determined that visitation with the Gravilles was in the best interests of the children. Judge Keppel also established guidelines regarding the appropriate amount and timing of visitation. In the contempt proceedings, Judge Hendrix concluded that outside assistance was needed to effectuate that visitation. She did not improperly delegate the visitation decision, or consideration of the children's best interests, to Dr. Block. Thus, based on our narrow interpretation of the Hendrix Order, the trial court did not violate DePasquale as it neither delegated a judicial decision to Dr. Block, nor abdicated its responsibility to exercise independent judgment. See DePasquale, 181 Ariz. at 336, 890 P.2d at 631.

[49] E. Attorneys' Fees.

[50] ¶27 The Gravilles request an award of attorneys' fees and costs on appeal pursuant to A.R.S. sections 25-324 (Supp.1999) and 25-414(C). We decline to award fees pursuant to the latter provision as it concerns violation of a visitation order. Although this appeal stems from a contempt proceeding, the subject of the appeal is the modification of the terms of visitation. Therefore, section 25-414(c) does not authorize us to award attorneys' fees to the Gravilles.

[51] ¶28 However, A.R.S. section 25-324 authorizes us to order one party to pay the fees and expenses incurred by the other party in a domestic relations case after considering the parties' relative financial resources. See In re Marriage of Zale, 193 Ariz. 246, 251, 972 P.2d 230, 235 (1999). One purpose of the statute is to provide a remedy for the party least able to pay. See id. (citing Gore v. Gore, 169 Ariz. 593, 594, 821 P.2d. 254, 255 (App. 1991)). The Gravilles may submit a statement of fees and costs, along with a verified statement of their financial resources. See ARCAP 21(c)(2) (statement of amount claimed shall set forth any other factors "relevant to the determination of a reasonable fee"). We will determine whether to award attorneys' fees, and in what amount, upon our review of the Gravilles' statement and any objection filed by Dodge pursuant to Rule 21(a), Arizona Rules of Civil Appellate Procedure. Any objection filed by Dodge shall contain a verified statement of Dodge's financial resources.

[52] CONCLUSION

[53] ¶29 For the above-stated reasons, we affirm the Hendrix Order.

Opinion Footnotes

[58] fn1 Discussions of the early factual and procedural history of this case appear in both Graville v. Dodge, 195 Ariz. 119, 985 P.2d 604 (App. 1999), review denied, Graville v. Dodge, No. CV-99-00910PR (June 16, 1999)("Dodge I"), and Graville v. Dodge, 1 CA-SA 99-0235 (App. Nov. 26, 1999) (unpublished Memorandum Decision) ("Dodge II"). We include here only the facts that are essential to our determination of this appeal.

[59] fn2 In his reply brief, Dodge discusses a pending United States Supreme Court case (Troxel v. Granville, No. 99-138) disputing the constitutionality of Washington's grandparents' visitation statute. Dodge relies on the tenor of certain justices' questions during the oral argument in Troxel to urge us to apply a strict scrutiny analysis to the issues raised in this appeal. However, this appeal does not address the constitutionality of Arizona's Grandparents' Visitation Rights statute, A.R.S. § 25-409. We addressed that issue in Dodge I, where we chose to apply a rational basis standard of review, not a strict scrutiny one, in determining that the statute is constitutional. See Dodge I, 195 Ariz. at 125-26, ¶¶ 24 and 27, 985 P.2d at 610-11. Here, our review is limited to determining whether the trial court abused its discretion by modifying the visitation order through the appointment of a supervising psychologist.

[60] fn3 The trial court found that the Gravilles' "attempts to have and maintain a relationship with their grandchildren have been successfully thwarted by [Dodge]. He has been, at best, uncooperative in arranging for visitation. His attitude indicates he has been unreasonably vindictive and spiteful in effectively denying visitation."

[61] fn4 The Hendrix Order provides that Dr. Block's appointment may be terminated on motion by the court or the parties, or by Dr. Block's request.

[62] fn5 The weakness of Dodge's interpretation of A.R.S. § 25- 410(B) is further revealed by his contention that parents can seek supervised visitation in grandparent visitation cases, but grandparents are prevented from seeking such assistance from the court. The best interests of the child are not well-served by an interpretation of § 25-410 that conditions assistance for visitation upon the identity of the party making the request for help.

[63] fn6 Dodge argues that Judge Hendrix was required to interview his children before entering her order. We disagree. See A.R.S. § 25-405(A)(Supp. 1999) ("The court may interview the child in chambers to ascertain the child's wishes . . . as to visitation.") (emphasis added).

[64] fn7 Dodge makes a passing reference to the fact that A.R.S. § 25-410(B) authorizes the court to order a "local social service agency" to supervise visitation. To the extent Dodge attempts to argue that Dr. Block does not fall within this definition and, therefore, the court lacked authority to appoint him, he failed to develop this argument on appeal. Therefore, we do not address it. See Ariz. R. Civ. App. P. ("ARCAP") 13(a)(6); Adams v. Valley National Bank, 139 Ariz. 340, 343, 678 P.2d 525, 528 (App. 1984) (court will not address issue party failed to develop on appeal).

Q Was he a good father?

A What time he was around the children, he was okay with them.

Q When you saw Doug interact with the children, was he appropriate with them?

A Yes.

Q Did they bond and relate to him?

A Well, he -- about the time that they would be able to bond with him, he'd have to leave again. He would only be home for maybe like three weeks or a 30-day leave or a three-week leave and then he would be off again.

25 Q I understand that.

1 A Okay.

2 Q Would he play with the kids?

3 A Would he play with them?

4 Q Yes.

5 A Well, yes, he played with them.

6 Q Would the kids go up to him and hug him

7 without any prompting on his behalf?

8 A Well, yes, they always was glad to see him

9 whenever he get home.

10 Q They knew their father?

11 A Yes.

12 Q They enjoyed being with him?

13 A Yes.

14 Q And Doug was appropriate in his parenting with the children?

A When he was around.

Q Yeah, I'm talking about what you observed.

A Yeah.

Q Not what you heard or anything, just what you saw.

A Yes.

MR. KANE: Excuse me, let me impose an objection here, Counsel. We're not contesting custody, this is not a custody case. This is a grandparents' rights visitation issue. We're not claiming the father shouldn't have custody. We stipulate that he has custody and should continue to have custody.

MR. ROWLEY: Are you through?

MR. KANE: Yes.

Q BY MR. ROWLEY: So during the time that Doug and Gayla were married you liked your son-in-law and thought he was an appropriate parent for your grandchildren?

A Yes.

Q After they got divorced, same feelings, still thought he was an okay father?

A Yes, he was okay.
